HISTORY CORNER

90 years ago, the admission of new students took place according to their report cards or, when they had none, based on the exam results. Back then, the enrollment started in June. The newspaper Kaja wrote on October 5, 1933 that the Tartu Estonian Youth Education Society Girls' Gymnasium is not experiencing shortage of students. The urge to get admitted to the school is high. First and foremost, the parents value the school's high academic level and the focus on the discipline. The school has always followed the requirements that the students are to be prepared for their future lives. The school holds a private Primary School and a Humanities and Domestic fields of study. The parents' express a wide range of demands and wishes towards the school curriculum. They agreed that the teaching of foreign languages should be expanded. Trying to meet the demand, the school starts to teach the first foreign language from grade 3 and the second foreign language from grade 5. In 1933, the first foreign language was German but over time, it more and more interest shifts to learning English. In addition, it is possible to learn French and Latin during the last three years of school.

Among other things, gardening is taught as a subject in the Domestic field of study. The challenges lie in the fact that the school does not own its private vegetable garden but this issue will be resolved because the exhibition field of the Agricultural Society, that lies across the street, is soon to be sold. The school is hoping to obtain an appropriate piece of land for their garden. With this, a major obstacle is removed from the school development process (Kaja, October 5, 1933)
